The initial version was the Universal Plug and Play (UPnP) protocol, where in addition to allowing users to share software like PC games, UPnP also allowed users to share data, files, and devices, such as printers, video cameras, and home stereo equipment. The term "plug and play" came from the fact that devices can simply be inserted into or removed from the network without any configuration needed. The first UPnP device was released in October 1999. UPnP replaced the earlier File Transfer Protocol (FTP) for data and file sharing. As the term UPnP became more generic, other implementations of the UPnP protocol started to appear, such as the Windows Media Server and Internet Radio Device (IRD) protocols. Although the UPnP protocol had been intended to replace the FTP protocol, Microsoft released the Windows XP operating system in 2001, which used the UPnP protocol as its default protocol for file sharing. The set of services that is generally referred to as "Windows-Networking/Windows-Client-Network-Protocols" includes the following services: Windows-Hid-Network (HIDN), HIDNET, IKEv2, Nap, NetBIOS name resolution, and NetBIOS service discovery. Along with HIDNET, Microsoft also released a protocol known as Windows Media Services (WMS). The protocols are used to implement services provided by a media server. Microsoft released Windows Media Player version 9 (or WMP9) in 2005, and in 2008, Microsoft released a new version of Windows Media Player, known as Windows Media Player 10 (or WMP10). In a June 2007 post on the Microsoft.Net forums, Thomas Lebeau states that support for the Windows Media Streaming Protocol will

I would like to display the service endpoint address/details on the server side so that when the call fails it's clear that something is wrong. I will eventually add logging (Rolled-back transactions etc) however I would like to be able to know if the service is down at the client side to notify the user. My current implementation is here - public async Task< GetAll(string url, HttpRequestMessage request, T @params = null) { XElement query = BuildQuery(@params); var response = await _request.GetAsync(url, query request); if (response.IsSuccessStatusCode) 648931e174
